Women in leadership is the most significant part of women empowerment. Women are the most powerful agents aimed at the development of society and humankind. Women as leaders and decision-makers at all levels are critical to advancing gender justice and gender equality—and to promoting economic, social, and political progress for all. When women are meaningfully represented and engaged in leadership bodies—such as legislatures, courts, executive boards, community councils—laws, rulings, and decisions are more likely to be inclusive, representative, and take diverse views into account. Women's leadership within households, including decision-making over land and household income, improves access to education and healthcare for their families.

The progress in women's leadership will not happen automatically. A number of parliamentary steps, corporations, academia, non-profits, and civil society played vital part to equilibrium power in leadership and decision-making change in the narrative on women in leadership, and confront socio-cultural drivers of gender inequality.
